

Tokyo

I am standing at a street corner where a road runs from east to west. To my left, there is a pharmacy with a green and white sign that reads 'FamilyMart.' The building has large windows and a modern design. In front of the pharmacy, there is a crosswalk marked with white stripes. On the opposite side of the road, there are several multi-story buildings, including a hospital visible in the distance. The area is lined with trees providing shade along the sidewalks, enhancing the urban environment. The overall atmosphere is urban and bustling, indicative of a lively neighborhood.

I am on a wide road running from east to west, with multiple lanes marked by white lines. To my left, there are tall commercial buildings with glass facades, and a park area featuring trees and a lawn. There is a bus stop located on the left side of the road, near the crosswalk. On the right, there is another building with a distinct architectural design, known as 'NBF虎ノ門ビル', and nearby, there is a tourism information center named '虎ノ門散歩道'. The road is lined with a motorcycle fence, and a footbridge is visible in the distance. The area is well-lit with street lamps, and there are directional arrows on the pavement indicating traffic flow.

I am in front of a vibrant alleyway known as '恵比寿横丁', characterized by its traditional lanterns and colorful signage. The storefronts display various food options, including yakitori and sushi, with bright, eye-catching banners. The area is lively, with a narrow street leading into the alley, lined with small eateries and a bicycle parked nearby.

I am in front of a modern building that houses the '東京環境工科学園' (Tokyo Environmental Science Institute). The structure features a sleek design with large windows and a combination of light and dark panels. There are several power lines overhead, and the area appears to be a mix of educational and residential buildings, with greenery at the base of the building.
